King. Well, let it strike.
Buc. Why let it strike?
King. Becæuse that like a Iacke thou keepst the stroke
Betwixt thy begging, and my meditation:
I am not in the giuing vaine to day.
Buc. Why then resolue me whether you will or no?
King. Tut, tut, thou troublest me, I am not in the vaine. Ex.
Buc. Is it euen so, rewards he my true seruice
With such deepe contempt, made I him King for this?
O let me thinke on Hastings and be gone
To Brecknocke, while my fearefull head is on.

Enter Sir Francis. Tirrell.

Tir. The tyranous and bloody deed is done,
The most arch act of pitious massacre,
That euer yet this land was guilty of,
Dighton and Forrest whom I did subborne,
To doe this ruthfull piece of butchery,
Although they were flesht villains, bloody dogs,
Melting with tenderneſse and compassion,
wept like two children in their deaths sad stories.
Lo thus quoth Dighton lay these tender babes,
Thus, thus, quoth Forrest girding one another
Within their innocent alabaster armes,
Their lips like foure red Roses on a stalke,
When in there summer beauty kist each other,
A booke of prayer on their pillow lay,
Which once quoth Forrest almost changd my mind,
But O the diuell! there the villaine stopt,
Whilst Dighton thus told, one we smothered,
The most repleniſht sweet worke of nature
That from the prime Creation euer he framd,
They could not speake, and so I left them both,
To bring these tidings to the bloody King,

Enter King Richard.

And here he comes. All haile my soueraigne Liege.
King. Kind Tirrel, and I happy in thy news?
Tir. If to haue done the thing you gaue in charge
Beget your happyneſse, be happy then,
For it is done my Lord.

King.

King. But didst thou see them
Tir. I did my Lord.
King. And buried gentle Tir
Tir. The Chaplaine of the To
But how or in what place I do
King. Come to me Tirrell so
And thou shalt tell the proceſse
Meane time but thinke how I m
And be inheritor of thy desire.
Farewell till soone.
The sonne of Clarence haue I pe
His daughter meanely haue I m
The sons of Edward sleepe in A
And Anne my wife hath bid th
Now for I know the Brittaine
At young Elizabeth, my broth
And by that knot lookes prou
To her I goe A iolly thriuing
Cat. My Lord.
King. Good news, or bad, th
Cat. Bad news my Lord, Ely
And Buckingham backt with t
Is in the field, and still his po
King. Elie with Richmond th
Then Buckingham and his ra
Come I haue heard that fear
Is leaden seruitor to dull dela
Delay leads impotent and fe
Then fiery expedition be my
Ioue, Mercury, and Herald fo
Come muster men, my counſ
We must be briefe, when tray

Enter Queene

Q. Mar. So now prosper
And drop into the rotten m
Here in these confines slily
To watch the waining of mi
A dire induction am I witne
And will to France, hoping

WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE Richard III (STC 22321) LONDON, 1634 THE BODLEIAN LIBRARY (Arch. G